Introduction to the topic

Cohesion policy supports the balanced economic development and correction of internal disparities through investments in general public goods, innovation, digitalisation, human capital, the environment and climate, social integration and transport, which can unblock and accelerate regional development, while contributing to overall sustainable growth across Europe focussing particularly on less developed regions. The policy has put forward a narrative of achieving both efficiency and equity, convergence and competitiveness, arguing that it is possible to maximise overall growth while also achieving continuous convergence in outcomes and productivity across Europe's regions. Despite the role that it has played in promoting convergence, in delivering EU priorities, supporting investment throughout the economic and financial crises, responding to the challenges of the pandemic and the war, cohesion policy is too often seen as a purely redistributive policy. A key issue is therefore to assess whether the current balance between the Treaty objectives and the delivery of cross-cutting EU policy priorities is the correct one and whether a new approach is warranted in the context of adapting the policy to the challenges of the 21st century reinforcing the equity-efficiency nexus.
